Blacks and Whites Are Battling for Land

Photographed for Life by Alfred Eisenstaedt

Stretching west from the Indian Ocean, starting from low plains and stepping upward to high, grassy plateaus, is Britain's Kenya Colony. Kenya lies on the Equator, but in the highlands the climate is cool and pleasant and the rolling downs look so much like England that when the first Britons came there 50 years ago they built homes to stay. They have lived comfortably off cattle raising and farming.

But wherever African land is attractive to whites, there the conflict between blacks and whites becomes most bitter. This has been especially true in Kenya where the threat of the simi (above) hangs over the colony and a cruel war is being fought between native Kikuyu and the British. In Kenya there are 30,000 whites and five million blacks. The British have settled the best land and have not faced the economic problems this causes among the fast multiplying natives. They have given the blacks representation in the Legislative Council but refuse to share their farmland. Through a secret society called the Mau Mau, by murdering and pillaging (Life, Nov. 3), the Kikuyu are trying to drive the British completely out. They have not only brutally killed and mutilated white farmers but their own people suspected of helping whites. Sometimes they have wiped out whole families and burned whole villages. “We were the meat and the whites were the knives,” they say, “just now we shall be the knives and the whites will be the meat.”
A FARMER ON DEATH LIST

A realist spokesman for the whites is 49-year-old, Yorkshire-born Mike Bundell, who owns a 1,200-acre farm in the heart of the highlands. Bundell came to Kenya as a farm apprentice when he was 18 and later sought virgin bush. By hard work he developed it into a trim, model farm. Unlike many whites who look upon the "Kukes" as "just 50 nuns out of the trees," Bundell believes in uplift for the blacks, but he also believes the whites should keep what they have worked for. The lau Mau have sent him notes threatening to murder him and his family, saying, "You will all die, and be sure your deaths will not be easy."

A VINTAGE BOTTLE, Bundell takes no chances as he makes the rounds of his farm. He talks to 16-year-old Kikuyu girl whose father works for him.

ON THE COUNTERATTACK

In Nairobi, the Kenya capital, the British still drink their pink gins and hopefully tell each other, "We musn't lose our heads over this." But the ex-Indian army colonels and majors still have not come up with a way to put down the native rebellion, and some who own farms in the danger zone are now wondering if perhaps they should get out—if they could find someone to buy the land. Three thousand British troop have been sent to Kenya and the settlers themselves have been organized into home-guard commands reminiscent of the American Wobblies. The brutal, wholesale killing by the Mau Mau has brought on harsh white retaliation. The settlers shoot or hang Mau Mau suspects from a portable gallows. Other thousands of "Kukes" have been herded from the Kenya towns and farms and transported back to the native reserves. But on the already overburdened, eroded land of the reserves the impoverished Kikuyu face starvation, and their resent-ment against the whites is only increased by such forced measures.

ON THE TRAIL after Mau Mau, heavily-armed African trackers examine the ground for tracks. Horsemen are on ready to dash forward if quarry is flushed.
