Julia Ipgrave has degrees from Oxford University (MA Modern History) and Warwick University (MA Religious Education; PhD Education). She has taught for 16 years in Leicester schools as class teacher, assistant head and head teacher. From 2004 to 2008 Julia was a Senior Lecturer at Oxford Brookes University engaged in Initial Teacher Education, supervision of postgraduate degrees, research and consultancy. Her present research interests include religion in education, young people's experiences of and attitudes towards religion, inter faith dialogue between school pupils and biblical influences on seventeenth century political theory. She is currently working on an AHRC/ESRC research project into young people's attitudes towards religious diversity (2009-2012) involving qualitative studies in schools across the UK. She is also engaged in evaluation studies of inter faith dialogue programmes for school pupils. Previous research work includes a role as joint research co-ordinator with Robert Jackson and Kevin O'Grady for the English strand of the EC funded REDCo project 2006-2009 (REDCo), and co-ordinator of the case study strand of a DCSF project into the use and reception of religious education materials in English schools 2009-2010.
