Works in Progress

Memory and Justice in Post-Genocide Rwanda. This book manuscript draws primarily on research conducted in Rwanda 2001-2005 to analyze the ways in which the post-genocide government is seeking to shape collective memory in Rwanda using memorials, education, courts, political reform and other mechanisms in the hopes of transforming group identities and also of securing the power. The book then looks at how the Rwandan population is reacting to the government's project of social engineering. Under contract with Cambridge University Press. Expected publication 2013.

Book

Christianity and Genocide in Rwanda. New York and Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2010. This manuscript, based on field research in Rwanda 1992-93 and 1995-96, argues that Rwanda's churches became implicated in the 1994 Rwandan genocide because of their historic links with the state, their active engagement in ethnic politics, and the ongoing cooperative ties between leaders of the churches and the state. The democracy movement that challenged the authority of the government also challenged the autocratic control of the churches by a limited elite who saw the genocide as a means of protecting their ecclesiastical positions of power.
