Advisor: Joseph Cropsey

Dissertation: "The Public and the Private in the Political Philosophy of Aristotle" questions the common view that Aristotle celebrates public over private life. The best regime ought to aim for an equilibrium between public and private activities and recognize that political order and virtue depend on the maintenance of privacy. Aristotle's esteem for private life emerges in his view of the household (chapter one), the economy (chapter two), law (chapter three), education (chapter four), and friendship and citizenship (chapter five). Work in Progress

The Art of Political Philosophy—an analysis of art (paintings, sculptures, drawings) pertaining to written works of political philosophy (dialogues, treatises, manifestoes) with the aim of enriching interpretation of those texts. I currently have a file of over a hundred images of paintings, sculptures, and drawings pertaining to thirty or so political philosophers, with historical information about the artwork. The project, intended to be a book eventually, will include reproductions of the relevant art.
