List the learning outcomes for the program

Students graduating with a major in Anthropology are able to articulate and act on a current understanding of basic facts concerning:

1. The diversity of human cultures and the principles anthropologists employ for studying them.
2. Fundamental cultural themes in at least one society other than their own, and the relationship of those themes to the dynamics of social organization.
3. Human linguistic diversity, and the shared properties of all languages that are associated with the unique capacities of our species.
4. The biological principles and historical contingencies that explain and govern the deep history of humanity as revealed by the findings of paleontology and archaeology.
5. The fundamental laws and processes of heredity and evolution, and their implications for individuals and populations.
