MANUFACTURING MORALS: THE SOUNDS OF SILENCE AT THE HARVARD BUSINESS SCHOOL

Michel Anteby is an associate professor in the organizational behavior area at the Harvard Business School. His research looks at how individuals relate to their work, their occupations, and the organizations they belong to. He examines more specifically how the practices people engage in at work help them sustain their chosen cultures or identities. In doing so, his research contributes to a better understanding of how these cultures and identities come to be and manifest themselves. Of particular interest to him are issues of moral cultures and identities. This explains why he tends to study socially disapproved behaviors, such as factory workers' illegal use of company property and the commerce in human cadavers for medical education. Field settings for these and other inquiries have included factory workshop, airport security teams, higher education, and whole-body donation programs. Michel earned a joint PhD in sociology from EHESS in Paris and in management from New York University.
