The Boston University London Graduate Mass Communication Program combines an internship, related coursework, and independent living. The first six weeks are spent taking two core courses. In the last five weeks, students work full-time in their internships while completing a thesis or research project for a total of 16 Boston University credits.

COURSES
All courses are four-credits and are offered at the graduate level. All students must complete the full 16-credit program, enrolling in two academic courses, the internship course, and completing a thesis or research project.

The First 6 Weeks
COM CM 738 Global Marketing Communication
The course focuses on nationality, branding, international distribution, sales promotion, advertising, public relations and intercultural marketing. Students analyze case studies decisions in the management of marketing in a multinational context. Included are the use of digital media, the Internet, viral marketing and blogs.

COM CM 744 British Media in the Digital Age (4)
The course will introduce the student to the wide range of British Media, from national institutions such as the main newspapers and the BBC, to the new digital media. It will provide an overview of the history and current status of the country’s media, and offer a sound introduction to other sectors of the creative industries, such as theater, music, and fashion. The course will focus especially on the theme of Britishness, and on how national identity is expressed in the institutions, practice and products of the media.

The Final 5 Weeks
OM CM 809 Graduate Internship
Students intern in journalism; advertising or public relations agencies; in corporate marketing or public relations departments; or other communications organizations. Graded final analysis paper is required.

Placements are contingent on the student's past experience and available opportunities in any given summer, so flexibility is essential.

COM CM 909 Thesis or Project Research
The type of graduate project selected will depend on the major and academic focus of each student. COM students will write a thesis or complete a professional project. IR/COM and IR students will write a major research paper.
