Social Justice, Liberalism and Philanthropy: An Investigation into the Tensions and Limitations of Charitable and Community Foundations in the UK

Balihar Sanghera is an associate professor in sociology at the School of Social Policy, Sociology and Social Research, University of Kent, UK. He has written articles on political economy, social theory and ethics in various journals, including Cambridge Journal of Economics, Theory and Society, International Sociology and Europe-Asia Studies. His previous research explored the contours of the moral economy in post-Soviet Kyrgyzstan and Kazakhstan, in particular looking into how class, inequalities and poverty can affect everyday morality and politics. His current research projects examine the ethical dimensions of charitable giving and philanthropic foundations in the UK, investigating how British individuals from working- and middle-class backgrounds morally frame donations, and how philanthropic foundations understand and identify social justice causes.
