What does Black History Month mean to you?

Dr. Yvette Cozier is the Executive Director of the Boston University Black Women's Health Initiative and is a Boston native and an investigator on the Black Women's Health Study. She is a prominent African American woman who has dedicated her life to improving the health of African American women through research. Her work involves exploring the influence of psychosocial stressors, socioeconomic status, and genetics in the development of disease in African American women. She also focuses on the development of health disparities in African American women, particularly the role of psychosocial stressors in the development of disease. Her research interests include social and genetic determinants of health, with a focus on health disparities in African American women. She is a leader in the field of health disparities research and has been awarded numerous grants and accolades for her work. She is a role model for young women and a leader in the African American community. (Black History Month became a national observance in 1986.) In high school, I learned about the contributions of Black women to history. I was taught about the history of the Civil Rights Movement, but I was not taught about the contributions of Black women to that movement. I was taught about the history of the Civil Rights Movement, but I was not taught about the contributions of Black women to that movement. I was taught about the history of the Civil Rights Movement, but I was not taught about the contributions of Black women to that movement. I was taught about the history of the Civil Rights Movement, but I was not taught about the contributions of Black women to that movement. I was taught about the history of the Civil Rights Movement, but I was not taught about the contributions of Black women to that movement.