Book-in-progress:

The Racialization of Print. Under contract with the Omohundro Institute of Early American History and Culture and the University of North Carolina Press. This project provides a new genealogy of the distinctively modern idea that a printed book can index the nature of a “race.” What can a book reveal about the racial group to which its author belongs? What historical conditions are necessary for such a question even to make sense, and how did such conditions arise? Beginning in the sixteenth century, with the spread of printing in Europe and the emergence of modern racial categories, and ending in the mid-nineteenth century, with the industrialization of print and the codification of scientific racism, I argue that it was only after the Age of Revolution that readers came to believe a printed book provides a special kind of racial knowledge. In the nineteenth century, this indexical logic was strategically embraced by many Black and Native American writers who published texts explicitly to forward the cause of racial justice. The first part of this project includes case studies on the early modern period – from John Smith to Mary Rowlandson to Phillis Wheatley – in order to locate the origins of this logic in the intertwined colonial histories of print, racism, gender, and aesthetics. The second part considers nineteenth-century writers like Baron de Vastey, William Apess, and Frederick Douglass, to explore the effects that print’s racialization had on writers of color, and especially their relationship to readers.
