Anna Howard Shaw Center

Welcomes

Eriko Sase

Research fellow at Takemí Program ín Internatíonal Health at Harvard School of Publíc Health

I Don't Want to be Troublesome to my Family

Illness Experiences of Former Korean Leprosy Patients

Numerous countries used isolation policies to protect people from leprosy prior to the discovery of drug to treat the disease.

In 2002, 759 Koreans stayed in a national leprosarium despite the policies cessation in 1963.

Little was known about why they stayed after 19th centuries progress in medicine, health policy and public health.

Interviews with 13 elderly patients revealed how they perceived, lived with and responded to leprosy and their interactions with family and society.

They demonstrated that stigma, deformity and self-prejudice led them to stay in the leprosarium, where they could avoid being "troublesome" to their families.

When? Thursday, Jan. 26, at noon Where? Anna Howard Shaw Center (Rm. 320)